Increased trunk flexion was associated with better start-up propulsion biomechanics. The findings suggest that increasing core muscle function by providing for better trunk support through therapy, wheelchair adaptations or FES could help improve start-up propulsion biomechanics.